Introduction :

Tsz Shan Monastery is a Chinese Buddhist monastery which appropriates elements of nature in its planning. It is located on a hilly site with an expansive sea view to the front. The core of the monastery consists of three main buildings placed along a central axis. Each building and associated courtyard is placed on platforms rising up the hill, well defined with surrounding corridors. On another axis branching off from the Grand Courtyard, devotees are led into the presence of the colossal image of Guan Yin, passing the Universal Gate Hall.

Throughout its halls and its grounds, Tsz Shan Monastery provides many spaces for contemplation. But even inside its most stately buildings, nature is present throughout: dark African padauk wood, wavy white-grey granite, marble and bronze are the monastery's most important building materials. They are ones of texture and richness with a connection to origin.

Within its walls there are beautifully manicured gardens and trees as well as those that remain untended. What is most important in Tsz Shan Monastery's design is that it blends and unifies its buildings with nature and creates an ideal space of meditation.
